I've got a situation where I have a data file with around 100 constants. I need to load these into a Python application. The problem is that it's not really about Python - it's about a language-independent interface. A: Use ConfigParser, you can read it into a dictionary: `import configparser; config = configparser.ConfigParser(); config.read('config.ini'); print(config.get('dict', 'FOO'))` This should work for you. You can also use this tool to generate python code from a configuration file: A quick overview of the documentation for Python configuration files. Tuesday, June 8, 2010 Have a question? Where do you start? I had planned to do this post some time ago, but it's been like a year since I've had the time. Q: What makes a good writer? A: This is a question for a couple of reasons. In the first place, "good writer" is too subjective a word to be used with any certainty. "Good writer" means different things to different people, and it's the same with "good editor." There are really good writers and there are great writers and there are people who are neither and there are writers who know what they are doing and who are trying to do something else. To add to this problem, it's also very difficult to determine what makes for a "good" (or bad) editor. I believe there are certain basic requirements, but those requirements are different for everyone. Some are more academic, some are more practical. I try to be consistent in what I look for in editing, but if I were going to try to provide examples, I'd have to say I look for: Patience. Patience for those who are slow and boring and those who are fast and have never learned anything. Patience for those who are tedious and repetitious and those who are a little slow and maybe a little repetitive. Patience for those who need a lot of rewriting and for those who 82157476af
